

TGC GAME JAM

The Right Angle*

Genre: Puzzle / Narrative / Strategy

Theme: Comic • Light • Twist

Concept

This is a puzzle game in which the player works as a media editor responsible for maintaining the heroic public image of a powerful superhuman. Each level presents a journal page containing several photographs that, when viewed together, reveal the truth: the supposed superhero is actually committing crimes.

The player's task is not to alter or delete the photographs, but to manipulate light and shadow to change how the events are perceived.

Gameplay

Each journal page acts as a single optical puzzle containing 3–4 scenes. The player is given optics related objects placed around the page. Eg:

- Lamps act as the primary light sources.
- Reading glasses redirect light into 2 forked rays.
- Paperweights block light and cast shadows over unwanted evidence.
- Lighter burn the evidence itself...maybe...

These objects can be moved and rotated around the scene. Player has to decide what scene to light up and what to hide. Eg: hide a dead body next to our superhero but not people cheering him. Since the scenes exist on single page with limited resources. Players must therefore manipulate the entire page together rather than treating each photograph as an independent puzzle. The player may have to decide what to show and where the image of our hero can take a soft blow.

By illuminating, obscuring, and visually recontextualizing different details, the player can transform a sequence such as:

Break-in → Attack → Theft → Escape

into:

Arrival → Rescue → Recovery → Victory

The underlying events never change—only what the audience is allowed to see does.

Since different players may position lights, shadows and objects differently, the same original crime can produce many different interpretations.

Stage Ending

At the end of each stage, the player's final arrangement is converted into a finished comic-book page. The 3–4 manipulated photographs are presented as sequential comic panels, accompanied by a generated headline or caption reflecting the story the player created. These are then seen by the denizens of the state which shapes public opinion and be assured the superhero cares very much about his image...

Current Implementation and Future

Early levels present the player's work as harmless media editing intended to prevent photographs from being "misinterpreted." As the game progresses, however, the original images become increasingly difficult to justify.

The player eventually realizes that the photographs were never misleading: they have been creating propaganda to conceal the crimes of an evil superhuman.

I really want to do it this way but for the sake of time and my first time making a game(👉👉)

I will stick with the basic idea of - "conceal the truth" - only stages with our beloved superhero committing crimes.*

This connects the jam themes directly to the gameplay: Comic defines the presentation and storytelling, Light is the primary puzzle mechanic, and Twist emerges through both the manipulated narratives and the eventual revelation about the superhero.

NOTE*

The game name may change I have not decided yet

The idea of beginning levels to ease the player into game mechanics may be done if time allows no promises.